A Critical Review of an Epistle Attributed to Idris-i Bidlisi
Risâlat al-Khilâfa wa Âdâb al-Salâtîn wa al-Wuzarâ

Vural Genç*

This review discusses the authorship of the epistle, entitled Risâlat al-Khilâfa wa Âdâb al-Salâtîn wa al-Wuzarâ, which has been attributed to Idris-i Bidlisi (1457-1520) in various secondary sources and proves that Bidlisi was not, in fact, the author of this epistle. By revealing the true identity of the writer, this review draws attention to a series of critical mistakes that have resulted from the misattribution of the work to Bidlisi.

Researchers generally group the works of Idris-i Bidlisi into three different categories: Persian treatises, Arabic treatises, and other treatises attributed to him in secondary sources. These first two groups are well known to researchers because of the existence of actual manuscripts. The absence of manuscript treatises attributed to Bidlisi in secondary sources, however, results in certain complications. For instance, researchers have misevaluated quoted sources and reproduced them without reference to primary sources and this has led them to misattribute certain works to Bidlisi. Tuhfe-i Dergâh-i Âli, Risâle der Ibâhat-i Âgâni, Haşîye-i Şerh-i Tecrid, Rafizilere Reddiye are just a few of these works.¹ Some of the works cited in secondary sources are taken to be treatises on their own, when in actuality they are not stand-alone works. Others are classified as authored by Bidlisi on the basis of only one sentence taken from a secondary source, with no material evidence in support.²

* Istanbul University
2 Tuhfe-i Dergâh-i Âli and Risâle der Ibâhat-i Âgâni exemplifies this case. For debates on the latter please see, Vural Genç, “Acem’den Rum’a”: Idris-i Bidlisi’nin Hayattı, Tarihçiliği ve Heşt Bebiştin
An example of an epistle misattributed to Bidlisi in recent scholarly works is Risālat al-Khilâfa wa Ādâb al-Salâtìn wa al-Wuzarâ. In recent scholarly publications, the epistle in question has been presented as one of Bidlisi’s. In Ebru Sönmez’s book titled Idris-i Bidlisi Ottoman Kurdistan and Islamic Legitimacy it was used substantively as a primary source, resulting in significant errors in argument while in Nabil al-Tikriti’s recently published paper entitled “Idris-i Bidlisi’s 1513 treatise on caliphal and sultanic protocols: Risālat al-Khilâfa wa Ādâb al-Salâtìn wa al-Wuzarâ,” the epistle in question was simply overviewed. In her third chapter, dealing with the image of the Ottoman caliph-sultan and the notion of the ideal ruler during the period of Selim I and Süleyman the Lawgiver, Sönmez suggests that Bidlisi wrote the epistle in question prior to Selim’s eastern campaign. His objective, according to Sönmez, was to depict the Ottoman political Sunni identity, which was shaped in the sixteenth century, and to assert that the Ottomans were the sole protectors of the Islamic world. Sönmez also argues that the Ottoman-Safavid conflict afforded Bidlisi the opportunity to articulate his political thinking. She adds that in 1512, when this epistle was completed in Cairo, the fight for the throne was ongoing among Bayezid’s princes and that a similar contestation was taking place throughout the Islamic world between the Ottomans, the Safavids, and the Mamluks. Accordingly, Sönmez claims that in light of this political context Bidlisi took it upon himself to create a new image of the Ottoman caliph-sultan by authoring this epistle.

In his recently published paper, Nabil al-Tikriti claims that the epistle in question was written by Bidlisi. Moreover, he asserts that it was one of the three major epistles presented to young prince Selim during the turbulent period in which he competed against his brothers for the Ottoman throne. Al-Tikriti explains that the epistle asserts the superiority of the young prince over his brothers...

---

4. Ibid., pp. 129,137.
and reflects hallmarks of the nasihatnâme literature, also known as “mirror for princes.” Furthermore, he alleges that as Bidlisi witnessed Selim’s rise to power, he began to write a nasihatnâme-themed epistle in an attempt to prove his literary talent and political savvy to the new Sultan’s court. He adds that after Selim accepted the work, Bidlisi went on to formulate the epilogue of his magnum opus, Hasht Behisht, according to the worldview of the new sultan. Moreover, he argues that the epistle, which he inappropriately describes as comprehensive, was submitted to the Sultan from Mecca as an ornate gift, in an effort to pave the way for Bidlisi’s receipt of the Sultan’s patronage.

Bidlisi’s use of both Persian and Arabic in the same text also draws Al-Tikriti’s attention. He claims that Bidlisi’s linguistic choices reflect deliberate objectives: to demonstrate his multi-lingual literary talent and to make a favorable impression on Selim. As evidence in support of these claims, Al-Tikriti quotes an ambiguous verse, which Sharaf Khan attributed to Bidlisi, in which the alleged author displayed his abilities to Shâh Ismâ’il in both Arabic and Persian. Additionally, he asserts that Bidlisi’s purpose in formulating certain Sunni arguments was to substantiate his own side, and that the epistle was written with the purpose of guiding Selim in his fight to secure Rum’s borderland against rebellions. Subsequently, by paying attention to each part of the epistle, Bidlisi portrays Selim as an ideal ruler and formulates a counsel on rulership (nasihatnâme). According to Al-Tikriti, in order to enhance the image of “The Shadow of God on Earth,” a concept, which was formulated for Selim, Bidlisi employed stories of Solomon-Balqis. Furthermore, he argues that the narratives Bidlisi wrote regarding tax collection for the purpose of sustaining rulership can be read as a refutation of Korkud’s assertion on this matter. In the last part of the epistle, covering military organisation, Al-Tikriti asserts that in referencing Alexander the Great and Cenghis Khan’s military traditions, Bidlisi endeavored to prove to Selim that he could be an able military counselor. The narrative of Iskender-i Zûl-qarnayn, according to him, was a vehicle for Bidlisi to legitimize Selim’s violence against the

---

8 For two other epistles –Anonimous Risala fi sharh qasida julus Sultan Salim Khanand Shams al-Dîn Jahrami’s Risala siyasiya bara-yi Sultan Salim- see. Al-Tikriti, “Idris-i Bidlisi’s 1513 treatise on caliphal and sultanic protocols”, p. 742.
10 Ibid., p. 745.
11 Ibid., p. 746.
12 Ibid., pp. 749-750.
Qizilbash rebellions and Shâh Ismâ‘îl.13 Lastly, he adds that although the epistle was not a masterpiece in its genre, after having been accepted by Selim, its author was summoned to the court where the Battle of Chaldiran gave Bidlîsî a crucial opportunity to serve as mediator between the Sultan and Kurdish notables. In this respect, therefore, the epistle served a real purpose.14

Whereas Sönmez states that Bidlîsî penned the epistle in question while he was in Cairo, Al-Tikriti claims instead that the epistle was written in Mecca. These two conflicting statements lead us to a vital question: is the epistle, indeed, Bidlîsî’s? Thorough research on the epistle under investigation has helped to put Bidlîsî’s authorship in question.

A sentence in the prologue—“God sent him to earth as Caliph when heretics emerged in the Rum borderland. He is Selimşah, King of Kings”—clarifies that this epistle was presented to Selim.15 According to its epilogue, the work was presented in February-March of 1513. The epistle consists of 43 folios and includes three parts. While it is not as detailed as the typical nasihatnâme, it can nevertheless be categorized as falling within the scope of nasihatnâme literature. The first section of the epistle, written in Arabic, deals with Maliki and Shafi jurisprudence (usîl al-fiqh) and the necessity of the Caliphate, and uses Quranic verses as evidence to corroborate arguments. The second section is bilingual, beginning in Arabic and continuing with Persian stories. It includes the concept of justice of kings and the etiquette of their viziers (‘adli‘l-umarâ wa adabu vuzarâhîhim), two topics, which are more consonant with the title of epistle. The main emphasis of this section is on the concept of the just ruler and the discussion is supported with reference to the stories of Solomon and his vizier Āsaf. Under the title of tertîb-i ‘asâkir, the third section focuses on military organization and campaign preparation such as making armor, blocking roads, and taking wealthy people on campaign. All of these were practices dating to the time of Alexander the Great and Cenghis Khân. It is clear that in highlighting his knowledge of military experiments, as Al-Tikriti accurately observes, the author aimed to attract Selim’s attention. At the end of this section, the author argues that a counselor of rulers is necessary, referencing the examples of Ilkhanid ruler Hülagü and his counselor Nasîr al-Dîn Tûsî.

13 Ibid., p. 754.
14 Ibid., p. 756.
15 Risâlat al-Khilâfa wa Âdâb al-Salâtîn wa al-Wuzarâ, f. 2a.
The only reference to Bidlişî’s authorship of this epistle is a note, written by a reader, stating: “as Ali Emiri attested, this epistle belongs to Bidlişî.”16 This note is attributed to Ali Emiri and is located in the first folio of the epistle. Several pieces of evidence exist with which to evaluate the note’s veracity. In the prologue of each of Bidlişî’s treatises he provides brief autobiographical information. In the epistle under question, however, this information is omitted. The epistle’s slapdash style, simple language, lack of eloquence, mixed Arabic-Persian text, and the abrupt interruption of the epilogue are further characteristics not found in Bidlişî’s works. While the epistle does reflect certain aspects of nasihatnâme, it does not resemble Bidlişî’s sophisticated treatises in the nasihatnâme genre, such as Mir’ât al-Jamâl and Qânûn-i Shabinsbâh. Simple grammatical errors or poor wording, for example, suggest that the author was an amateur, unlike Bidlişî.17 As a matter of fact, in folio 8a, the author of Risâlat al-Khilâfa wa Âdâb al-Salâtîn wa al-Wuzarâ identifies himself as Khotani18 in a sentence written in mixed Turkish-Arabic. According to this information, it is reasonable to conclude that the author of this epistle is in fact a man by the name of Khotani.19 Besides the language and style of the epistle, the content itself also calls into question Bidlişî’s authorship. First, the author states that when he heard about the Selim’s march to Edirne he told a fortune through the Attar’s Mantîq al-Tâyr in front of the congregants at Friday prayer.20 This statement indicates that the author was close enough to Selim to be aware of his activities. Second, that the epistle was penned in Zilhijja 918/February-March 1513 also denotes that it cannot have been penned by Bidlişî. In far off Mecca, Bidlişî cannot have possibly known of Selim’s every movement. While observing Selim’s march for the throne, Khotani, the author of Risâlat al-Khilâfa wa Âdâb al-Salâtîn wa al-Wuzarâ, must have sought Selim’s patronage through the production and presentation of a simple epistle.

16 Ibid., f. 1a.
17 Some grammatical errors have been selected among them such as: اینچنار [اينچنار], كورخته [كيرخته], كوريز [كيريز] Except these, the non-use of vav-i ma’dûle in writing of the verbs such as: خووهد [خووهد], خواهد [خواهد], میخاست [ميخواست] clarifies that the epistle has not been penned by Bidlişî.
18 There is no information about Khotanî in both inamât defters and suara tezkere.
19 لما سمعت عزمه إلى شهر الادرنة ففتأت بسمه في أمر السلطنة في يوم الجمعة بعد الصلاة في حضور الجماعة... see, Risâlat al-Khilâfa wa Âdâb al-Salâtîn wa al-Wuzarâ, ff. 7a/b.
A more careful and rigorous analysis of Bidlisi’s intellectual life and his extant corpus, with particular attention to his eloquent chancery style, could have prevented scholars from misattributing authorship and consequently constructing misleading arguments concerning the life and work of Bidlisi.